

TruStile Doors Prominent Design Feature in Street of Dreams Home

The custom molding used within the door was carried into the casing, baseboard and wainscoting, creating an impressively coordinated millwork package

"We love TruStile Doors and actually designed and selected the interior doors before almost every other product in the home" stated Candace. "We feel that interior doors really help to establish both the level of quality and attention to detail within the home."

The custom molding profile that the Whites designed into the door turned out so great, they decided to carry it into the casing, baseboard, wainscoting and even some of the cabinets within the home. The result is an impressively coordinated millwork package that truly sets the home apart and contributed to its quick sale to a Street of Dreams attendee just three days after opening to the public!

View gallery of TruStile doors featured in the con Amore show home

TruStile Doors were a prominent feature in the "con Amore" home in this year's 2011 Portland, Oregon Street of Dreams. Designed by husband and wife team Richard and Candace White of the Whitehouse Collection, con Amore was designed with a Northwest Traditional style and casual elegance in mind.

Taking advantage of TruStile's extensive custom capabilities, the Whites sketched up a door elevation and profile that fit with the linear lines they wanted to carry through the interior of the home. A distinguishing feature of the two panel door design was a distinctive custom molding profile and an elevated, senior panel — both of which TruStile was able to bring to life based on the White's drawing.

"We feel that interior doors really help to establish both the level of quality and attention to detail within the home."

All doors featured TruStile's new senior raised "E" panel